1. The controlling rule

A Delaware corporation is not automatically compliant with the employment, payroll, tax, insurance or workplace law of the country or state where a person actually works. The work location controls the local obligations. A remote employee in another state or country may create registrations, withholding, insurance, leave, data-protection and termination obligations that Delaware does not address.

This guide is a control framework, not a legal opinion. Confirm the current law with local counsel before an offer, a start date or a payroll run. Where local law is more protective than a company policy, local law controls.

2. Jurisdiction summaries

3. United States — state and local control

Federal law applies nationwide. The state and locality where the employee works may add or modify requirements, including:

- state income-tax withholding and unemployment-insurance registration;
- state disability insurance and paid-family-leave programmes;
- state minimum wage, overtime, meal-and-rest-break and pay-statement rules;
- state workers' compensation coverage;
- state and local paid-sick-leave rules;
- state anti-discrimination, accommodation and background-check rules;
- state wage-payment, final-pay and deduction rules;
- state privacy, monitoring and AI-employment rules;
- local business licences and workplace notices.

Do not assume a Delaware registration, a federal EIN or a policy written for one state satisfies another state. Record the employee's work state and county/locality in the workforce register. Confirm the state addendum before signature.

4. Nigeria — local employing arrangement

A US company employing a person who works in Nigeria must establish a lawful Nigerian employment and payroll arrangement. The options may include a Nigerian subsidiary, an employer-of-record arrangement or another structure confirmed by counsel. The structure affects contracts, PAYE, pension, NSITF, insurance, data protection and termination.

The company should confirm:

- pension applicability and contributions;
- NSITF registration and the Employees' Compensation Scheme;
- workplace safety and employee-compensation obligations;
- leave, working-hours and termination rules;
- Nigerian data-protection requirements for employee records.

The commonly stated pension reference for covered employees is 10% employer and 8% employee. That is not a conclusion for every worker or arrangement. Applicability, current rates and the approved pension arrangement must be confirmed before the first payroll run.
